TOM WAYMAN

The Call

Rain in gusts all day
that slackened a little at dusk but the night dripping. I sat
in my room
in the dormitory at the edge of the woods by the edge of the sea.
As I finished a page
in the glare of my desk lamp, as my fingers caught the paper's upper right corner to turn it

I heard a voice
—urgent, but without sound—

Go outside

I glanced through the window at the drizzle
lit with walkway lights.

Again the voice suffused me:

You must go outside

The tone was uncompromising.

Go out and

across the road Impatience vibrated in the words and a sense I was being drawn to a purpose: a moment
or presence.

I stood
uneasy. But I walked downstairs, through the main doors

and felt the first drops soaking into my shirt to skin. The voice remained certain:

Across the road

Enter the forest

On the closest shoulder of the highway I paused.
I peered over at the tangle of underbrush and evergreens. I saw only rain.

The voice propelled me forward.
On the other side of the road
I halted that much nearer to the woods, shivering in the chilled damp of my clothes.
Black sky. Heavy downpour now. Wind in the cedars' gravely swaying tops.

What would meet me in the dark?
Nothing but branches and roots and the massive trunks of the trees showering me
with winter rain:
icy ocean's breath
calling me fool

Or a tall man
waiting ahead in a clearing
—one eye socket horribly scarred, a raven walking the wet ground
at his feet,
a horse nearby
cropping grass in the forest's deep silence

Or a fire far off
that as I approach
I see is ringed with cloaked human shapes seated at the hissing flames A face—now male, now female—lifts in my direction as I struggle in the drenched brush toward them

I trembled to guess the unknown I was called to Because I could not understand in advance this event
I was afraid

Then the sound was the drops driven by the gale against the hard surface of the road
and the leaves.
Behind me, past a lawn, the dormitory rose through rain like a lighted ship.

I turned to look at the building's doors, stairs, my room. I began to retreat.
Yet the instant I swung away
I knew I had spurned a great summons or gift,
an enormous
chance.

I'll Be Right Back

When the last of my chairs is loaded on the truck
I'll be right back

The boxes of books
wholesaled away, my files and trunk full of mementos from childhood bagged for the trash
I'll be right back

The last poem of mine
finally excised in the anthology revision I'll be right back

When no one alive
remembers there was a person with my name I'll be right back

And I don't mean reincarnation
And I don't mean
soul
I don't mean
we're all part of the biosphere Nor do I mean
random evolutionary chance

I mean I'll be right back
